Listening Like Your Life Depends On It™

Human beings are habitual, automatic and routine listeners. We often do not consciously choose how we will listen, and therefore our point of view is colored unconsciously. In this Short we work with groups to identify different ways people listen – in itself a novel thought – then propose a profoundly mindful question useful in any area of life.

Permission

How often do you have an experience of someone telling you what you should do, think or be and/or offer their perspective, without asking permission first? How often do you do this to others? Where do we operate with an assumption of permission and what might be the value of examining that? This Short asks you to consider the value of paying attention to Permission.

Evolution of Participation

Are there levels to participation and if so, what are essential dynamics that support higher and higher levels of engagement? Rather than give you methods and techniques, this Short proposes that educator observation of students, seen through a keen lens of the components of participation, can help build awareness to environments that foster student engagement at high levels.

Doing AND Being

A true conundrum facing educators today is how to balance the busy-ness of education – the lesson plans, assessments, meetings and endless logistics – with a mindful awareness of who they are as human beings. This Short proposes three distinct questions that honors the needed aspects of “the doing” and provides a Cause Pause™ moment to balance it with “being”.
